WASHINGTON, D. C., THURSDAY, JULY 12, 1888.

Expedition.

"WALLOWING IN MUD.

The Squadron Caught in a Very Tight Place.

INGENIOUS RESCUE.

Desperate Fighting in Retreating Down the River.

BY W. H. MICHAEL, LATE OF THE NAVY.

VL THE BED RIVER EXPEDITION. IE participation of a part of this squadron in the famous Red River Expedition furnishes a chapter in naval history that is not a repetition of any previous experience. There was anxiety on the part of the Government to get control of Mobile and Texas, on account of considerations of public policy not wholly unconnected with the French invasion of Mexico in June, 1863. Farragut turned his attention to Mobile, and the Red River Expedition was understood to be in some way not calculated to establish that kind of supremacy to any considerable extent. It proved itself the supreme fiasco of the war, and made a fearful draft on Yankee genius in devising ways and means for getting out of scrapes.

But for Gen. A. J. Smith, Lieut.-Col. Bailey and Porter, the bare probability is that Banks would be somewhere in that locality now, and the wreck of Porter's fleet would be pointed out as a monument to military folly rarely if ever equaled.

Porter took his ironclads above the falls at Alexandria against his better judgment, and had not A. J. Smith been with the expedition he would have utterly refused to do so. Porter had confidence in Smith and was willing to co-operate with him, as he was always with Grant and Sherman. Smith and Porter agreed perfectly in their opinion of the expedition that, as it was being conducted, it was a stupendous farce and a disgrace to the Government.

SAVING THE FLEET.

BANKS'S WAGON-TRAIN CHARGED AND THE IEONCLADS WALLOWING IN MUD.

While Franklin and Emory were forcing their way through Banks's panic-stricken wagon-train to get at the pursuing enemy at Pleasant Hill, the gunboats were wallowing through the mud and bushwacking their way toward Shreveport. As an illustration of the experience of the gunboats for several days in succession, we will give their fight with Gen. Green's command at a point 100 miles below Shreveport. Several transports and a gunboat were hard aground, and a number of other boats were pulling at them to get them aflost, when 7,000 rebels, with artillery, attacked them from the west bank of the river, a few rods away. The gunboats replied as soon as they could, and in about two hours drove the enemy off, killing 700 of his men, including their commander. The canister and shrapnel thrown from the heavy guns of the boats into the dense ranks of the enemy, massed on the bank and just back of it, proved awfully destructive. The next day the enemy made a similar attack on the boats from the other side.

The Eastport, one of the best of the ironclads, grounded hopelessly, and had to be blown up; the river began to fall rapidly the enemy was banging the boats right and left when they could hardly defend themselves, on account of the high banks; the tinclad Cricket was knocked all to pieces. and captured, and the other light drafts had been severely handled; the ironclads had floundered through the mud for days, and Banks, after fiddle-faddling to his heart's content, was anxious to get out of the country-in fact, all hands were willing to get out. When they got down as far as Alexandria, as was expected by Porter, not a vessel could be run over the falls. Here was a pretty kettle of fish. The river would not rise for months, Banks said his forage was nearly gone, and that he could not wait many days on the gunboats. Things looked blue for the navy. Relief came through the GENIUS OF LIEUT.-COL. BAILEY, who proposed to raise the water on the falls by a system of dams. Ten thousand soldiers and the entire naval force, under this officer, lent willing hands, working in water up to their waists, to complete the work within the few days given them by Banks. whose uneasiness to get away increased day by day. The dam was completed, and the water had risen high enough to let the boats over, when it gave way. Nothing daunted, Bailey and his willing helpers went to work building wing dams, and before certain officers high in command had done lamenting over the catastrophe the new dams were thrown out and the fleet saved.

The water on the rapids was raised six feet, and, considering the few days in which the work was completed and the difficulties overcome, it was, as Porter characterized it, a most marvelous piece of engineering. Bailey received the thanks of Congress and was promoted to Brigadier-General, all of The Wretchedly Planned Red River which he richly deserved for his great services to the country.

> While our army was lying at Alexandria the enemy, by a spirited manuver, got by and planted a powerful battery on the bank below. Two light-drafts, the Covington and Signal, started down the river with a convoy of transports. They were surprised by the battery and sharpshooters and, though they made a gallant fight, were so badly handled that one was captured and the other was abandoned by her crew and set on fire to keep her from falling into the enemy's hands. This was the last effort of the enemy to obstruct the river. The army and fleet soon moved down, and the enemy gave them a wide berth. On the 20th of May, 1864, while the army was returning, Gen. Banks was relieved by Gen. Canby, and the remarkable expedition was over.

ADMIRAL LEE TAKES COMMAND. During the Summer Admiral Porter was relieved, Capt. Pennock taking charge until November, when Acting Rear-Admiral Lee took command. He found the squadron in such admirable shape and so well organized, and its work so nearly done, that his new command entailed comparatively little labor or responsibility. Guerrillas and light detached bodies of rebels continued to operate along the banks of the Mississippi, Cumberland, Tennessee and White Rivers, greatly to the annoyance of unarmed transports. The Red and Yazoo Rivers were effectually blockaded by the rivers named were constantly patrolled by gunboats until the close of hostilities.

The squadron was kept busy with this | Esop's Fables. kind of duty, for it seemed that every Confederate command had detached large numbers of desperate men, full of dare-devil spirit, and eager to rob somebody, nearly all of whom had gathered along the rivers as the safest and most promising field for their nefarious work; but the gunboats gave them little rest, and often inflicting the severest punishment upon them. Sometimes the gunboats were roughly handled by roving batteries, and in several instances tinclads were destroyed by them. At Clarendon, Ark., in June, 1864, Gen. Shelby planted a battery during the night bearing on the Queen City, and at break of day fired into her as she lay at anchor, with most of her crew in their bunks and hammocks. She was completely disabled, and that part of her crew who failed to escape by swimming to the opposite shore were taken prisoners. Before Shelby could remove the heavy guns of the captured vessel he was compelled to blow her up, by the sudden appearance of Gleams the blade of polished metal, the Tyler and two light-drafts. These boats immediately attacked him and BLEW HIS GUNS CLEAR OUT OF THE WORKS, killing and wounding many of his men. The loss of the boats, however, in the engagement was nine killed and 27 wounded and one boat disabled.

The main course of the war in the West had now drifted away from the Mississippi Valley to the region south and southwest of Nashville, embracing southern and eastern Tennessee and northern parts of Georgia and Alabama and Mississippi. This gave the tinclads on the Tennessee and Cumberland more work to do. In an engagement with Gen. Forrest in October near Johnsville, on the Tennessee, after a desperate fight, the Undine, Keywest, Elfin and Tawah, light-drafts, were burned to keep them from falling into the hands of the enemy. Had they been able to hold out a few hours longer the arrival of Gen. Schofield would have relieved them. But they had fought the enemy, who had heavy rifled pieces planted above and below them, till their last round of ammunition was gone, and the only thing left for them to do was to burn the boats and escape to the opposite shore from the

On the 24th of October, 1864, a superior force of rebels attacked Gen. Granger, who was stationed with a small force at Decatur, Ala., above the Muscle Shoals. The garrison defended itself heroically, but the enemy had gradually forced it to the point of surrender, when the little tinelad Gen. Thomas arrived and drove the rebels off with con-

In December, 1864, the rebel army under Hood moved against Nashville. The Carondelet and five light-draft gunboats hurried to the support of our army. The enemy planted a battery of four 20-pounder rifles four miles below the city, on the river. After | Broke the child the solemn slience, a severe fight the gunboats silenced this battery and drove the encampment back. But other batteries were planted the following night is more advantageous positions, and for days the gunboats had plenty of hard fighting. Two batteries while fighting the boats were surprised and captured by the cavalry. Thus the gunboats moved up and down the river, thwarting Hood's plans and harrassing him in such a manner as to aid Gen. Thomas very materially. For 30 days and nights the officers and crews of the vessels had very little rest, so constantly were they called upon to head off Hood in his efforts to escape. But for the almost-impassable roads and the inability of the gunboats to get above the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee, the bulk of Hood's army would have been captured. Gen. Thomas wrote a letter to Admiral Lee thanking him for the efficient co-operation of the gunboats.

On the 14th of August, 1865, Admiral Lee was relieved, and the Mississippi Squadron as an organization ceased to be.

A Merited Rebuke.

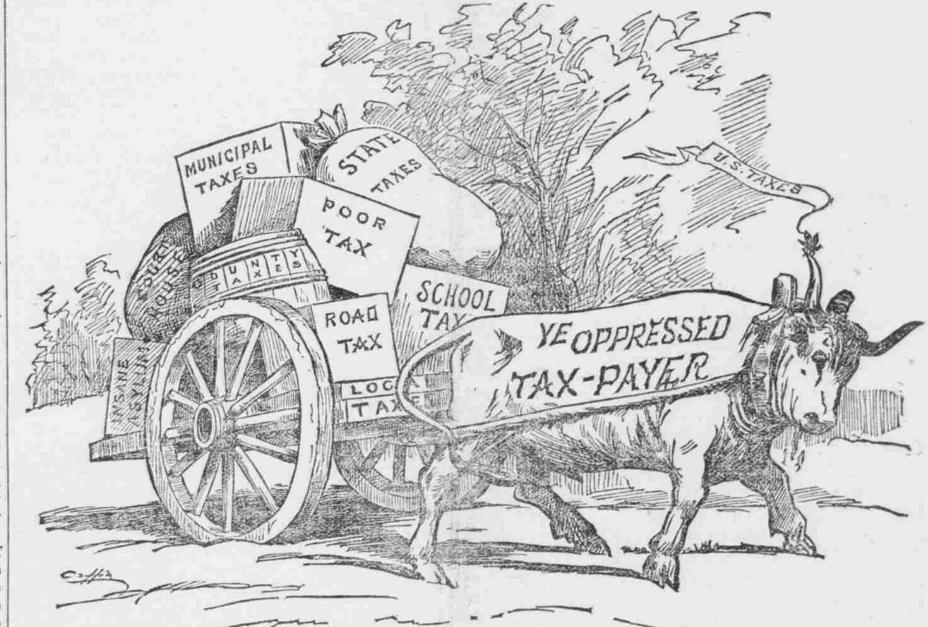

[The End.]

[New York Sun.] Father (whom Bobby has induced to take him)-Now, Bobby, I don't quite understand this. If the man who throws the ball fails to hit the club after three trials, does that put the Bobby-Pa, do you remember why you sent me to bed last night at 7 o'clock?

Father-Why, n-no. Bobby-It was for asking foolish questions.

WITH A MODERN APPLICATION. FABLE

The Ox and the Gnat .- A weary Ox was travailing under a heavy Load, which was almost too great for his Strength, when a Gnat, gunboats, though not traversed. The other | which was Disporting itself in the Air, settled upon one of his Horns. "My dear Fellow," buzzed the Gnat, "excuse the Liberty I take. I perceive now you are very Weary, and as I am doubtless Heavy I will relieve you, and go at once and rest on that Poplar. "Stay or go, it makes no Matter to Me," replied the Ox; "Were it not for the Buzz made I should not have known you were there."-

THE DRAGOON'S SABER.

A Ballad of the Day McPherson Fell. BY EDWIN A. WELTY, OREGON, MO.

[The scene of this poem is located at Augusta Me.; being suggested by an incident occurring there at the meeting of Gen. Logan with James G

In a quaint New England village, Where tall maples line the street, Neath whose leaves the June day's sunshine

Falls a molten, glimmering sheet; Where the Kennebec's soft waters

Blaine during the campaign of 1884.]

Sweep along, a silver thread, Through whose meadows, rich with clover, Lowing herds are daily led : There beneath the maple's shadow

Stood a homestead old and gray, While o'er windows, door and casement Climbing vines in clusters stray, And within the open doorway

Struggling sunbeams softly fall, Till they touch a dragoon's saber Hanging on the further wall.

As the sunbeams o'er it roam, Strange adornment, say you, surely, For that peaceful cottage home. Near the window, in an arm-chair,

Sits a man of iron mold, Though the storm of seventy Winters Have on form and feature told. The blood of men who fought with Knox

Coursed in the old man's veins, He came of good Green Mountain stock, Whose limbs ne'er bent to chains, And 'twas said that Andrew Warner Had faced death in every form-

In the march, and siege, and picket, In the battle's deadliest storm. He had fought at Cerro Gordo, And had charged at Monterey

And when boomed the guns of Sumter He was ready for the fray. Under Grant at Chattanooga He had stormed the cloud-capped ridge,

And had rode with Streight's battalions O'er the Chattahoochee bridge. With the rock of Chickamauga He stood that Autumn day.

When the bleeding corps of Thomas Held the rebel horde at bay. By the veteran sat his grandchild,

While he smoothed her tangled hair, When the echoes of a bugle Floated on the Summer air. Followed by the boom of cannon

And the tramp of many feet, And a throng of surging people Fill the old New England street, What means this?" The veteran's grandchild Answering, caught the street's glad strain, Why, they say that John A. Logan

Frembling rose the aged soldier, Gazed he fixedly and long On a tall, commanding figure Moving 'mid the hurrying throng, Greets to-day the Man of Maine.

Murmured he, 'tis Gen, Logan, I would know him anywhere, With his grand and stalwart figure,

And his courtly, martial air. Fainter grew the strains of music And the tramp of hurrying feet, Till at last the usual sitene Fell upon the village street. Then the old man left the window. Took the child upon his knee, And upon his rugged features Trace of tear-drops you could see.

Clear her words as soft they fall : Hanging on the cottage wall.

Not of Champion Hills or Vicksburg. Where you bore yourself so well; Tell me how you fought with Logan On the day McPherson fell,"

Why, my child, I've often told you Of the saber and the day; Would you like again to listen How was won the bloody fray?"

Yes," plead the child. The veteran's face Beamed on her soft and mild. His lost youth's flery spirit seemed Reflected in the child.

Well, so be it. Listen, Nellie, While the stirring tale I tell Of the scenes that July morning When Hood's line upon us fell.

"The night before, in Logan's tent, The battle had been planned: How on the left McPherson's corps Should Hood's advance withstand,

"The center Blair's Brigades should hold,
'Ere dawned the morning light,
While on the right bold Logan's men Should early force the fight.

The bugle called, at early dawn Our battle-line was formed; Twas whispered that the breastworks near

By Hood would soon be stormed. The caissons of the batteries

Shone black as rose the sun; Grim cannoneers in uniform Stood each beside his gun. The bayonets of the infantry

Gleamed brightly rank in rank, While the dragoens and mounted men Were ranged upon the flank. 'The boom of Logan's heavy guns

Comes faintly to our ears, When suddenly along our front A thread of gray appears, Then comes a crash of musketry. And then our cannons roar,

And on the swiftly-moving ranks A deadly fire we pour,

Our volleys fierce and flercer grew, The tide of gray rolled on, To melt in spray as do the waves That dash the cliffs upon.

McPherson's every nerve was strained To baffle Hood till night, For Blair had failed to fill the gap That opened on our right.

Thus we fought from early sunrise, And had barely held our ground, While the heaps of dead and dying Told how fierce the fight around

At last their charge begins to tell, Our columns sway and rock,-The lines that stood so firm since dawn Yield slightly to the shock.

A courier reined his panting steed

Where our brave Colonel stood, And said, 'McPherson dying lies In you narrow strip of wood, So low the words you scarce would think The officer had heard,

And yet the murmur down the ranks Showed our whole his a was stirred, In vain I saw the off rs

Appealing to the men; No human power-you would have said, Could hold them firm again. A battery of heavy guns Was taken on our left,-It seemed as if the wavering line

In twain would soon be cleft .-When suddenly there comes a lull, And then a burst of cheers, And in that hell of death and shell

The master's form appears. A swarthy figure, powder stained, Swift down the line doth ride, Beneath his charger's hoofs the dust

Marks every swinging stride. The glittering star on shoulder-bar The rider's rank shows well,

It needed not the wild huzza That rent the air to tell 'Twas Logan come in person To save the waning day;

He asked no one to tellow Save where he led the way. ' My comrades true your duty do, Your leader's death avenge

And be the charging squadron's cry, McPherson and revenge! Close up the ranks, in column charge, Upon you battery wheel. Ride down those gray-clad cannoncers

Give them a touch of steel.' They hear the gallant leader's voice, The shattered ranks reform, The hoarse cry rolling down the ranks Forbodes the coming storm.

'McPherson and revenge' the cry As flashed our glittering blades, And at the charging column's head Rode Logan and his Aids.

Full thirty double-shotted guns Play on the bronzed dragoous, And good three thousand muskets sweep

Their grim, compact platoons. Straight for the guns the columns swept, In vain the cannons roar, Fades cannoncers and infantry

Like chaff from thrashing-floor. My horse swept onward in the rush. My eyes were fixed away

Upon a gold-laced color-guard Dressed in a garb of gray. The flag was knotted 'round his waist, His sword he waved on high, The swath of dead about him showed

He well the blade could ply. A moment more our sabers crossed, I saw my foeman backward start,

And in his saddle reel. But, child, he was a swordsman true; His biade had grazed my hair, While mine had cleft his temple through,

And laid his skull-bone bare. I grasped the blood-stained colors from The trooper when he fell. And heard the manly Union cheer

Above the rebel yell. " 'Well done, my gallant comrade,'
The words rang loud and clear;
I turned, and saw that Logan

And his staff was riding near. "I wish that I full recompense For such a deed could show,

But a full-fledged Captain's epaulets Will grace that form I know.' "He drew his sword from out his belt:

'Let this my own thanks tell; I know that Capt. Warner's arm This blade will e'er wield well.' 'I tried to thank the General As he gave the sword to me,

I could neither speak nor see. " At last I spoke, but Logan then Was dashing to the front; His flery spirit ne'er could rest, Save at the battle's brunt."

But so full my eyes of joyons tears,

The old man stooped and kissed the child.
"My dear, my tale is done;
I've told you how in manhood's prime
You saber, child, was won." The child looked up; the eyes that e'er Gleamed fierest in the fight

Were fixed upon her upturned face With soft and tender light. The foreman of a large printing house one morning received the following note from the wife of one of the men in his employ: "Please eggscuse my husbant for not coming to work to-day. He is ded."-Chicago Ledger.

JOE GALE.

BY CHARLES H. DOING, BELTSVILLE, MD.

'There's a tramp at the door wanting something Tramps are plenty this season, I'm sure. Shall I tell him to travel, or give him a treat? It's sad to be crippled and poor."

Let me look at the duffer before he comes in; I never was partial to tramps Take the guild altogether, they're children of sin; As a lot, about so many scamps.

What a queer fish he is! Take a look at that coat; It was made for a man half his size; And that old vest he wore when he cast his first But he looks a man square in the eyes.

He's wanting an arm with the rest of his wants; He's as gaunt as a mule under-fed; But that look in his eyes still my memory haunts; And he seems a bit off in his head.

Strange! his face seems familiar; can it be I have met This odd-looking genius before? But I'll give him a seat while his dinner you get, And I'll chat with his trampship some more. Lose your arm in the war?" (Ah, that touched the right string.) "Yes, Boss, you guessed right the first time; It was in the war that I lost my left-wing, And the stump isn't worth a half-dime. Which side was I on? Why, the right side, of

Do I look like a traitor to you? Though I'm only a tramp, and a cripple at that, I am ready to die if I do. No, I fought for the Union, a glorious cause, And I cherish it still as I ought,

Though it's small thanks I get for my trouble But it wasn't for thanks that I fought. 'Twas in old Tennessee, in the year 'sixty-two.' We had only been out a short time-

Had hardly got used to the harness you know; All the same, we made Johnny Rebs climb 'At the Stone River battle-you've heard of that There yourself? Then I reckon you know

What a pienie it was, how from morning till night We fought in the rain and the snow. 'Twas the 73d Hoosiers to which I belonged, Attached to brave Harker's Brigade; We started the fight about three hundred strong. But we left half our men in the glade.

On our flanks, in our front, like hornets they swarmed, And they got in their work like brave men. We charged them-they broke, then rallied-re-And charged us again and again.

I got down to business, as well as the rest-Till a piece of a shell struck me here; When I got on my feet, I thought it was best,

Halt, comrade, right there; let me tell the rest; You're dodging the best of the tale; All is clear to me now—your name's easy guessed You are K's gallant Sergeant, Joe Gale. And when on that field I lay panting for breath,

With a minic-ball wedged in my thigh, With every flerce volley expecting my death, In torture, yet fearing to die, 'Twas your powder-grimed face that bent over With your shell-shattered arm by your side;

With pain-whitened lips that were touching to see, To save the poor drummer you tried. And save him you did; I recall what you said. Right there in face of the foe:

Why, a drum is no good if the drummer is dead, And we've got to have music, you know.' Then tenderly lifting my form from the ground, You bore me safe back to the rear;

And from that day to this your face I ne'er found Though I've looked for it far and near; But now I have found you, let this be your home ;

To me and the flag you were true:

And while I've a ration, a roof, or a room

Old comrade, I'll share them with you, CAPT. McGINNESS, OF CO. Q.

BY ROBERT BLACK, CASCADE LOCKS, ORE. "Who leads the charge?" the General cries. Captain McGinness, of Co. Q: Flash of battle in his eyes.

Bravest bum you ever knew. No turkey gobbled at Capt. McGinness. No daring rooster's clarion blew; Well they knew their name was Dinnis When they crossed the march of Co. Q.

There the tattered banners flew : There you bet your bottom dollar, Charged the braves of Co. Q. They were the boys that pulled the trigger, They were the men of the Union blue,

Afar where the porker loved to wallow,

Getting Ready for the Wedding. [Chicago Tribune.]

Sherman's bummers, Co. Q.

Thrashed the Johnnies and freed the nigger,

Frugal young man (to object of his affections) -Darling, your father being a minister, perhaps we'd better ask him to perform the ceremony for us. He would do it as reas-in fact, I presume he would think it an insult if I should offer him anything-ermate the bridegroom put upon the bride.

Frugal young man (uneasily)-H'm! Money couldn't express it in my case, darling. All the wealth of the world couldn't do it. But I've got a second cousin, a Justice of the Peace, that will marry us for $2.

Hangman's Noose.

GETTYSBURG.

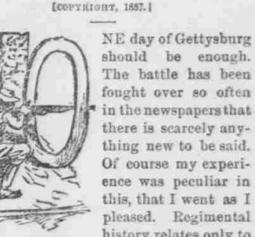

Service Under the Shadow of the

A Few of the Sights of the Second and Third Days.

THE SHARPSHOOTERS.

Headquarters.

Council of War at Gen. Meade's should be enough. The battle has been fought over so often in the newspapers that there is scarcely anything new to be said. Of course my experience was peculiar in this, that I went as I pleased. Regimental history relates only to the observations from one fixed point.

The evening of the first day it looked badly nough to me, and if I had been Com in-Chief I think I should have changed the base to a point a little farther away from the rebels. I was defeated.

There was one little episode I have never seen recorded. After the charge of Pickett, on the third day, had failed, everything had quieted down. Meade, accompanied by his staff, went over the wall and rode along our entire front from Cemetery Hill to the Round Tops, receiving the cheers of the whole army, or all that was left.

That was the only time I ever heard

DODGING THE SHARPSHOOTERS. band in the woods at Little Round Top, that played "Hail to the Chief."

I never hear that old tune nowadays on these fancy parades but it brings up the recollection of that great day, and causes the cold chills to creep up and down my in this position that I became bold enough

I rode with Gen. Meade this day, to prove which I will ask some of the survivors who or silently moving about behind that old witnessed that event to recall a smoothfaced boy on a lame horse that brought up the rear of the dashing cavalcade. My nag got hurt the first day, and I did not have a chance to steal another, and as I was bound to be on hand I had to ride my lame horse.

The General and staff always go at a break-neck gallop, the staff tearing along in the rear like a tail to a comet, so that in this case I "got left" about a gunshot to the rear, and because I so energetically spurred the lame horse to catch up, our boys behind the stone wall gave me the laugh and some to the right. I had seen enough, and slid cheers of derision. They were all feeling pretty good just then, and were excusable. One of the staff officers told me that we had captured Gen. Longstreet, and when I got over among the Reserves I told this bit of news, where it created a sensation.

I have never seen an account of that ride along the lines in print. It is correct, though it may have been the fourth day instead of the third. You will find in the rebel reports of the battle that Gen. Lee states that on hearing these shouts and cheers from our army he thought it meant an advance on his line, and he made preparations to meet it. I think it was the cheers for Gen. Meade that he heard, even so distant as his headquarters. I was on hand bright and early the morning of the second day. I was not in so much of a hurry to save the day as I had been. I rode down the same road I did the morning before, but I went along more cautiously. There was no booming of guns to be heard. Though THEY WOULD NOT LET ME THROUGH nearly 200,000 men had been gathered there in the night, the surroundings the second down to the ground and crawled back on allmorning were decidedly peaceful,-unusu-

A majority of people have formed an idea that a battle is a continuous uproar from | the house-tops at the upper end of the town. daylight until dark, or during all of the days on which it occurs. As a matter of fact, headquarters, trying to find out what in the real fight is soon over one way or thunder was up; everything was so awfully Object of his affections-I don't know. I another; that is, the actual contest of the quiet. have often heard papa say that he could always larger bodies ends about as suddenly as a collision on a railroad.

picket-firing of the night previous is the first | They were having a prolonged caucus. I indication; then will come the more frequent | learned that it was proposed to send a detail occasional shot from a battery; perhaps it ends with this. I have nearly always noticed that the officers and men thought it had ended, and were only suddenly awakened to the fact that it had not by a tremendous boom from some battery that would nearly always be discovered to be at some point they did not expect a hostile shot to come from.

It may not be an agreeable thing to print, but, secretly, it has been my experience in a battle that it was always the unexpected that happened to our officers.

I came down the road straight towards Cemetery Hill to find headquarters-at least that is what I started out to reach. I was stopped before I got up the hill by an order from somebody to "Get off that road." I got off as directed, and went into a little grove to the left and almost in the rear of

IT LOOKS AS THOUGH SOMETHING WAS

UP, DON'T IT?" the Cemetery, where I had seen a group of officers on horseback. I do not remember who they were, but seeing that they did not know any more than I about the "prospect," which was just then the important question, I tied my horse to a tree to find out something for myself. I proceeded to climb up the crest of the hill on my hands and knees, with all the humility, respect and caution that I felt was due to the rebels. I wanted to see them all once more very much, indeed, but I did not care to have any of their sharpshooters discover me first. There were batteries upon batteries, the horses of which were down on the hill to the rear, in the care of their riders. The artillerymen were, of course, around their guns, but most of them were hunting places not too much exposed. I did not see the line at first; you know the artillery is always behind, or to the rear of a line of battle. supported by infantry. Bound to see the shape of one advance of that line of battle, I went as far out as the very crest of the hill nearest the Cemetery gate. When I got that far I was paralyzed by another yell from some unseen quarter to "Get down, there!" I got down, and in that abject position heard the voice explain, in not very gentle tones, "the sharpshooters are on the tops of those houses." The houses referred to were so close that I could almost count the bricks in the chimney-tops.

There was a fellow, an officer, some distance ahead of me, standing behind a tree, looking for all the world as if he was having lots of fun playing hide-and-seek with someone. I concluded to play too, and crawled up to the base of another tree close beside him. When I got behind that tree I felt perfectly safe from an attack of the whole rebel army. I was feeling so secure to stand to one side, that I might get a good view of our fellows. I saw them lying down ley in hopes of seeing the rebels, there was a little "ping" noise near me, a sharp sting on my face as if someone had thrown a handfal of gravel at me, It was only some of the bark of the tree, which had been dusted into my face by a minie-ball.

While I was intently gazing over the val-

I got behind the tree. I staid there, too, standing up against it as stiff as a post, and hugging it as close as its own bark. I was afraid to turn my head either to the left or

THEIR LINE. fours, after the manner of the harlequin on ally quiet, as compared with the first morn- the stage. I found the headquarters, which was located not very far from that spot, but out of reach of any hiding sharpshooters on During all that morning I was about

> In the early afternoon I sent a note addressed to Gen. Meade into the dingy little

It is a long time beginning; maybe the old shanty where he had his headquarters. clattering from the skirmish-line, with an of men to try to open up telegraph coa